Sharon is a reporter and commentator on military and security affairs for the Channel 11 Kann News, and it's worth noting that until recently he wore a kipa, and he's far from being a leftist. But he sees what's happening.

Translated via Google Translate and then slightly edited.

The creeping transfer that Jewish rioters have been carrying out against Palestinians in recent months is echoed in right-wing leaflets and Telegram groups. The method has become very simple: setting fire to buildings in small villages while using physical violence against anyone who tries to resist or document. At some point, the residents will realize that no one will protect them from terrorism, they will surrender and abandon their homes. In the nearest synagogue leaflet, they will celebrate another victory of "purification of the space," of course without telling their dear readers that the result was achieved through violence.

In agricultural areas, the method is similar. Outpost activists invade Palestinian pastures or orchards every day, and in such a situation, the Palestinian is left with three alternatives: either give up the area, or call the police, or try to expel the invader. The result of the first two alternatives is the same - surrender to violence and loss of the area. The third alternative is to enter into a violent confrontation with armed Israelis (military soldiers or civilians), meaning the incident ends either with an injury or with a bullet to the head, as we saw the other day in the village of Karyot.

In most cases, the shooter (in the Karyot shootings, the dead did not even throw stones, according to the military investigation) will claim that he acted to remove a threat, that he shot because he felt a danger to his life, because a stone kills. This is of course true, but when the victims are Palestinians, no one in the security forces deals with the question of who provoked and who invaded whose territory - the entire incident is defined by the IDF as "friction" as if the two sides met in sterile territory and began throwing stones at each other. And in the case that the victims are Jews, the stone thrower is immediately the "terrorist" and therefore either gets shot or is arrested within a few hours, plus a picture with a flannel cloth over his eyes.

The responsibility for the anarchy unfolding in Judea and Samaria lies primarily with the IDF Central Command (which is also responsible by law for enforcing law and order and has therefore failed in its duty), whose forces are scattered throughout the area and in practice allow masked rioters to engage in violence, with the Shay Police District, which has failed to collect evidence and file indictments, with the Civil Administration not sufficiently enforcing illegal construction in new outposts, and with the Shin Bet Jewish Division, which has failed for years in thwarting terrorism, and has been dragging its feet in recent months with too many investigations.

None of the four organizations has a chance of defeating the disturbing phenomenon alone. The year in which the fewest Jewish terrorist incidents were recorded was 2016. This happened after the arson attack in Duma in which the members of the Dawabshe family - a couple and a baby - were burned to death. The State of Israel decided to take off the gloves, and all security agencies, together with the Ministry of Justice, and with the backing of the Prime Minister (Netanyahu), fought the perpetrators of violence.

The motive that joined the phenomenon of Jewish terrorism in the past year is transfer. It is no longer the motive of revenge because, unlike in the past, there are not many attacks, neither the thwarting of a political process (the price tag method was invented to thwart the evacuation of outposts) nor the bringing of the end that we saw in the past. The new motivation is the expulsion of Palestinians and the takeover of new areas in the occupied territories, and the method is physical violence, arson, and shooting - with a blind eye or backing from the security agencies. The State of Israel stands by, and that's about it.
